After only a year and a half, Tremaine Emory the creative director of Supreme is leaving his post. And in his resignation letter he _____ was at the heart of the reason why he left. Supreme was founded 30 years ago by James Jebbia.

From its earliest days, Supreme has always _____ Black culture. Over the years, there have been products like t-shirts featuring images of Malcolm X and _____ Black culture.

But there have always been questions about what it means for a company founded and owned by a White man to be engaging in Black culture without somehow appropriating it. And all of this _____ last week when Tremaine Emory decided to leave Supreme.

Now, the reason for Tremaine Emory's departure really comes down to a collaboration that Supreme was doing with an artist called Arthur Jafa. Now, Arthur Jafa is a Black artist whose work often _____ of slavery.

In fact, in the marketing campaign there were going to be depictions of formerly enslaved people with whiplashes on their back. And there are really _____ for both sides of this debate. In the end, James Jebbia decided _____ to pull all of those images from the marketing materials and Tremaine Emory thought it wasn't right that he wasn't consulted in this important conversation.

Emory has used this incident to _____ how systemic racism works in the fashion industry. There are many fashion brands today that hire Black creatives _____. So there's Louis Vuitton that brought on Pharrell as a creative director. Gap brought on Kanye West to design a collection.

But Emory's point is that it is not enough to just bring in Black talent and put them in these roles. You really need to empower them to be making decisions. This is not just a lesson for the fashion industry. This is really a lesson for any brand in any industry that is looking to create an _____. But what do you think about what went down at Supreme? Let us know in the comments. (thoughtful music)
